

As an undergraduate student majoring in atmospheric science, I was fortunate to participate in the 16th International Seminar on Climate System and Climate Change (ISCS) at Yunnan University. The participants in this seminar are mainly students who are involved in climate change and other related industries. The seminar invited five international experts and scholars as instructors, and national experts and scholars assisted in the analysis to help us understand the academic reports of international experts faster and more accurately. During the ten-day training, five experts and scholars each had two days to showcase their research results. This is my first time to participate in international-level academic exchange seminars. The profound knowledge and cutting-edge academic insights of scholars have made me deeply harvested and have many insights. I am most interested in Japanese professor Mikiko Kainuma and British professor Andrew Manning's introduction to Carbon Capture and Storage.

As an audience, we have also been divided into groups to discuss and study together in groups. Completion of small tasks and points, this is the standard for selecting outstanding teams at the end of the seminar. The source of the points is the daily group member sign-in rate, the number of questions, the circle of friends, and the completion of special tasks. We also have a reception during the whole seminar, and extra points can be added to the performance. In addition to the excellent team, each group will also elect an excellent team member of the group at the end. Participating in this seminar is not only an opportunity to improve your academic literacy, but also a good opportunity to make friends. The members of the group come from all corners of the country. Almost every group will have one or two foreign friends. The foreign friends of my group have missed this seminar because of temporary problems. It is a little regret. But our group has a very nice fairy leader. She will not only help us understand the content of the report, but also take us to play Werewolf under the class. As the host, we also took the group members to the beautiful Zehu and Bell Tower to play. Especially happy.

The ten-day seminar was soon over, and finally I was very fortunate to represent our team on stage and make a short group report summary in English. I was very nervous before I took office, but I became more confident after I started. In fact, this is also a good opportunity for experience. Through this academic study, I know that I still have a lot of aspects to improve myself, and continue to cheer! Don't miss attending ISCS if you have the chance!
